

Graduation '90

host could require the offender to write a paragraph explaining why rap shouldn't be considered the disco of the '90s. Warning: Witnessing another human being punished in this manner is not for the weak at heart.

For graduating law students, the "Oh my God, What if I Don't Pass the Bar Exam?" party is a must. Guests practice eating tuna-fish sandwiches while thinking about alternative careers and how they will pay back huge student loans.

By far, the most exciting party is the "Real World" party. This involves cutting your hair, buying a new wardrobe and looking for a job. Once the party begins, guests wake up early each morning, go to work, come home, kiss their mate, decide what to have for dinner, watch T.V., think about the two-week vacation coming up next year, and then go to bed so they can get up the next day and start it all over again.

The fun never lets up.

Awards for teaching also to be handed at ceremony

The University will hold its spring commencement ceremonies Sunday, June 10, at Autzen Stadium. The exercises will begin at noon with a University-wide gathering of graduates and guests at the stadium.

After the commencement address and the conferring of degrees, University President Myles Brand will present the Distinguished Service Awards and will recognize the recipients of the Burlington Northern, Charles E. Johnson Memorial, Ersted Distinguished Teaching and Graduate Teaching Fellow awards. The following is a partial list of awards and this year's recipients:

- Burlington Northern Award: Gerald Ungson, associate professor of management and director of the University's international business program; Daniel P. Kimble, professor and head of the psychology department; and R. James Mooney, professor of law.

- Ersted Distinguished Teaching Award: Leonora Cohen, assistant professor of education; and Jack Watson, assistant professor of theater arts.

- Graduate Teaching Fellow Award: Caroline Jewers, doctoral candidate in comparative literature; Tatyana Gorokhovskaya, master's degree candidate in Russian. Honorable mention will go to James Thornton, doctoral candidate in economics.

- Distinguished Service Award: Otto J. Fromayer, Medford attorney; Paul Olum, retired University president; and Aaron Novick, retired director of University's Institute of Molecular Biology.
