students into custody. Eleven others were injured.

"From the outset," admitted Temple spokeswoman Kathy Gosliner, "it had racial overtones."

Temple President Peter Liacouras ordered disciplinary proceedings against five police officers and 10 students involved and better training for the security force.

Liacouras met May 2 with the newly formed Concerned Black Students to discuss its demands. He agreed to give the group a say in the hiring of a new security director. He refused, however, to fire any officers or set up an office to handle African-American affairs, as the group demanded.

Students were not satisfied.

"We're not going to stop until we get what we want," declared Temple grad student Ed Glaude, leader of CBS, which coordinated a May 4 rally in front of the student center to press Liacouras to meet the rest of their demands.

"Temple is not interested in resolving the issue but in protecting Temple," Glaude said.

Champaign police officers' attempt to break up a large party April 24 and a mostly black crowd outside a campus bar April 23 also prompted charges of racism against the officers and a call for an outside investigation of the force.

"The Champaign Police Department violated their authority by detaining and arresting African-American students," stated a May 2 student government resolution. "There is no show of force at predominantly white events of a like nature."

Champaign Deputy Police Chief Don Carter issued an apology April 27, saying the city and the department "regret the occurrence of two incidents ... resulting in increased tension between minority students on campus and the Champaign Police Department."

At Wisconsin, student protesters crowded the office of Chancellor Clifford Smith the next day to protest alleged police brutality, claiming one of the arresting officers used his night stick to beat the legs and back of at least one of the men arrested.

OLUM

The two peace activists renewed their acquaintance in February 1989, when Papandreou returned for an international conference on nuclear-free zones.

Olum was forced to retire in the fall of 1988 by the Oregon State Board of Higher Education. Olum had a reputation of not working within the system and always speaking his mind, which upset many officials.

Olum also upset Gov. Neil Goldschmidt by supporting the Oregon Public Employees Union in their strike during Fall 1987.

Myles Brand, from Ohio State University, replaced Olum last June, becoming the University's 14th president.

Rumors about Olum and Papandreou heightened again in January when Olum spent several weeks vacationing in Greece.
