

KEMP

"During winter term I have more time to do other things, and it's easy to get caught up in them," he said.

Kemp redshirted his sophomore year in 1987, and didn't get to play until last year, when he had 14 tackles as a back-up to Derek Horton.

After spring practice this year, Kemp was the leading candidate for starting free safety, but ended up starting only in the "Hawk" package after Eric Castle took over as the free safety. The back-up role doesn't bother Kemp, however.

"It's alright," he said, "as long as I get to play and contribute, and that's just the way it should be. We should be concerned with team unity, not individual effort."

In fact, Coach Rich Brooks and Schuler don't see Kemp's role as a back-up one.

"I don't consider him a back-up," Brooks said. "He's playing an awful lot, making contributions, especially with the interceptions."

"I consider him a starter," Schuler said. "He's been very, very good as a starter on the 'Hawk' team. He is a great athlete. He was right on the verge of being a starting cornerback, but we moved him inside because of his speed."

Kemp has also had to play with a nagging shoulder injury he suffered a year ago.

"I respect him for playing hurt," Schuler said, "and that darn thing is still bothering him."

Schuler describes Kemp as a deep thinker off the field, and said that mannerism carries over on to the field.

"He's not a big rah-rah guy," Schuler explained. "He has always kept the game in perspective, and hasn't made it his whole life. He realizes that football is just a game."

Perhaps the realization comes from his experiences in life. Kemp grew up in Milpitas, Calif., an area he likens to a melting pot of all different types of people. His desire for counseling comes from the days when his brother's and sister's friends would come over and talk about their problems.

So when he came to Oregon Kemp became a peer adviser.

"I am the type to come up to freshmen and break the ice," he said. "I ask them how their classes are going, and how life is going. Just so they know they can come and talk."

Kemp said he also enjoys working with disadvantaged children.

"It's the relationships with the kids I enjoy the most," he said. "Some of the kids are mentally disturbed, and some are bright and just don't have a home. I just try to give them examples and experiences and try to tell them it will all work out."

Kemp said that his skills in communication have carried over to the team, and Brooks agrees.

"He is a bright, articulate, and serious young man," Brooks said. "He gives us leadership, and at safety you really have to communicate well."
