open forum held by Brand with the feeling that "the burden of proof" was on students to persuade the administration that the Eugene community favors the concerts.

Despite early misgivings about involving himself in an issue that is trivial compared to things such as the rising number of hate crimes, Adan said he was glad he decided to speak out on behalf of a band that promotes tolerance and acceptance of many different viewpoints.

And he said the overwhelmingly positive response to his petition has reaffirmed his belief in his cause. "People told me they were glad someone was doing this," Adan said. "I realized I was tapping into this energy and helping people put it into the right context."

Fan alleges assault

A female University student filed harassment and fourth degree assault complaints against a member of the Phi Delta Theta fraternity alleging that the member pushed her down and spit tobacco on her at the Arizona State football game on Oct. 20, according to Eugene police.

Amy Hope told police that she and her three companions sat in the student seating area of Autzen Stadium when they were approached by several members of the fraternity.

They were told the row they were sitting in was reserved for Phi Delta Theta members, and that they should move. Seating in the student section is on a first-come, first-serve basis.

Hope told police she refused to move. As other fraternity members arrived, they were told to abuse Hope and her companions for remaining in the section.

The subject of the complaint pushed Hope to the ground and repeatedly hit her in the back during most of the game, Hope told police. She obtained the man's name after talking to the fraternity's president.

As of Friday, no formal charges had been filed, and Eugene police are continuing to investigate the incident.
