tion . . . so rather than giving it lip-service, let's deal with the problem at the root cause," she said.

Timber-related issues are another area where the candidates share little ground. Lonsdale supports a ban on all log exports from private lands while Hatfield believes tax incentives, not a ban, should be offered to discourage log exportations.

"Why not try incentives first without coming down on them with an economic hammer," said McGregor, referring to Hatfield's position.

But Lonsdale does not concur with Hatfield's plans.

"I'm in the race to try and save the rest of the ancient forests in the Northwest," Lonsdale said.

"We all know what (Hatfield) has done for timber in this state. That has since been found unconstitutional," Lonsdale said, referring to the Hatfield-Adams Rider that proposed timber cut levels for one year at levels that did not please environmentalists.

Lonsdale said if elected he would work to create new jobs in the state to replace lost timber-related jobs. He said he may propose giving displaced timber workers government loans to help them start their own businesses and ease the transition from their current jobs to another form of employment.

Aside from his plans to enact tax incentives, Hatfield's plan for the forests is to a large extent unknown, but he is currently developing a strategy to assess how much of the forests need to be protected and how much can be cut to keep timber-workers employed.

The one issue the candidates do agree on is the U.S. role in the Persian Gulf.

"If we go to war we must let Americans decide and not George Bush," Lonsdale said.

McGregor said Hatfield believes the United States should not be involved in a confrontation that could lead to war because there are not American interests in the region and because Congress has not authorized President Bush to go to war.

"The senator sees a lot of frightening parallels (between Vietnam and the Gulf crisis)," McGregor said.

Moreover, Lonsdale and Hatfield both said they support increased funds for student grants, which have seen decreases in funding of 60 percent to 70 percent over the last 10 years. But their specific plans to increase funds are unclear.

cause of their positions on issues, then the mudslinging and accusations thrown in during their campaigns could be a deciding factor.

According to the Federal Elections Commission, Lonsdale has spent more than $1,084,959 for his campaign in which he says that Hatfield is a tool of special interest groups, political action committees, and a man out of touch with his constituents.

Responding to the allegations, McGregor said, "The senator is known by his independence. People know where his money comes from. We have no idea where Mr. Lonsdale's money comes from."

Meanwhile, Hatfield has spent more than $1,332,000 on his campaign accusing Lonsdale of being inexperienced and "over his head."

Lonsdale retorts, "(Hatfield) has never balanced the books. I have."

final destination as it nears completion.

It minimizes on site construction time and labor and this is very advantageous, Corner said.

In Oregon, it would mean not just shipping lumber for use in houses being built in the Western United States, but also that Oregon laborers would be employed to put housing panels together. This would create more jobs in the Eugene area.

"The ultimate objective is to build building systems in Eugene and sell them to California," Mosely said. "It is better (for the state) not just to supply wood but also entire panels put together by Oregon laborers with Oregon raw materials."

It is a procedure that has gained in popularity in Europe and the University is currently involved in negotiations with a company interested in bringing Swedish production techniques to the United States and Lane County, Mosely said.

The future of this project depends on private and public partnerships the center can set up in the future, Corner said. These partnerships depend on the public sector being more stable and ongoing, he said.
