Administrators focus on Measure 5 effects

CORVALLIS — The Oregon higher education system will have to wait out the Measure 5 storm, Chancellor Thomas Bartlett said Friday at a meeting of the Oregon State Board of Higher Education.

"We have begun a new period," Bartlett said. "Whatever the long term might bring, we have to live through the transition."

"I believe we will come out of this with a state system that is even stronger," he said. "We have the people to take on this challenge."

Measure 5, a property tax limitation, reduces property taxes $25 per $1,000 assessed value this year and $15 per $1,000 by 1995-96. Higher education administrators fear their budget might be cut to compensate for the state's lost tax revenues.

Some administrators have expressed confidence that the tax will be restructured and provide a new, stronger base for funding for higher education.

"Given the challenge of restructuring the tax system, it isn't clear whether we should congratulate the winners or the losers," Bartlett said.

Bartlett did not make an official statement to the board, but his comments suggested a "wait-and-see" approach to the potential cuts in higher education.

"It's too early to know the precise impact ... the political leadership is changing and we can't define the problems until the transition leadership is complete," Bartlett said.

Until a funding strategy is implemented, Bartlett said planning and budgeting would be important. He added that revenues as well as expenditures would be evaluated, including "significant" tuition increases.

"They're definitely part of the emerging strategy," he said.

In response to concern expressed by some University faculty about hiring freezes, Bartlett said that for the University to gain a reputation as a frugal institution is a risk that needs to be taken for now.

He said decisions will be made about system-wide funding in late winter at the earliest, or possibly in spring.

"We've taken prudent steps to deal with next year's short fall," said University President Myles Brand, who attended the meeting. "We don't need to worry yet."

Brand couldn't say whether or not tuition would be raised for the 1990-91 year. "It depends on what the legislature does," he said.
