In Touch with the Music School

Classical guitar student at music school still getting used to concerts, butterflies

Since the age of 16, practice has paid off performance but would eventually like to teach both music and English at the university level.

Now a senior, Vancek lives in Cloran Hall, the music dormitory, in Hamilton Complex. Cloran has a practice room, and each term there is a fireside concert where students perform for each other.

Vancek practices alone three to five hours a day, practices with an ensemble group twice a week, and is also in the University Women's Choir. Vancek also tutors for the music analysis class and works in the music school library.

She says one of her concerns is that the school doesn't have a guitar program.

Vancek receives lessons from David Case, adjunct instructor, and says the teachers are all encouraging. "The thing that really stands out to me is that the teachers really keep you going," she says.

—Anna Rembecki

Because she likes the romantic and Spanish classical music, Vancek has studied it since she began playing guitar, but she would also like to try jazz, blues or rock music someday.

Although there is a lot of anxiety to performing solo, Vancek says she likes it more each time and is getting better at it.

"People say you get used to it the more you do it," she says.

When Vancek is getting ready for her next performance, the Christmas Choral Concert on Dec. 4, she may again experience the nervous feelings. But she knows performing is worth it.

"The best part is afterward knowing that you played as well as you could because you spent so much time practicing," she says.

—Jennifer Thomas

Her parents were encouraging when she announced her plans to study music at Douglas College in Canada where she spent her first two years.

Vancek, 21, says music is "a really personal thing that you can share with people. It's definitely a form of communication and expression."

She looked into many schools to transfer to, but Oregon stood out because the application process was organized and she had heard positive things about the School of Music. She is majoring in classical guitar

Classical guitar student Gina Vancek practices a composition in her room in Cloran Hall. Vancek, a senior, will complete a bachelor's degree in music performance next year and hopes to continue studying guitar in graduate school.
