said. "Even with a bachelor degree from a university, women earn on average what men earn who have a high school diploma."

In general, women-dominated jobs are service oriented, even on a professional level, and not far removed from the jobs they traditionally performed in the home.

"Women have been traditionally responsible for the services in the home, the so-called 'reproductive labor' of feeding and cleaning and raising the next generation's work force," Winkler said.

"With industrialization, more and more of these functions have gone out of the home and into the paid workplace," she said.

The opportunities for women in men-dominated and often higher paying fields are limited, Acker said, particularly in technical fields. Moreover, women are still expected to be supportive of the man's career by running the home.

"Women are expected to
