guy," and he dislikes the jokes because people assume that all politicians are evil.

Craig said he gets frustrated when he reads something in the newspapers that he believes is unfair or untrue. "Those type of articles ruin my day," he said.

Despite the drawbacks, both men said their father's position has not interfered with their lives.

"The phone (at home) sometimes rings 40 times a day ... He's been busy, but we've still gotten the benefits of his being a great dad," Mark said. "Bottom line — there's been more positive than negative things."

Aside from their personal views, and considering that their Republican father has been characterized as "intensely partisan" — a description that may not be good news for the Democratic minority in the House — Craig and Mark said they have confidence in their father's ability to lead a politically divided House.

"I think he's as good a leader as the House of Representatives could have. He's very bright ... and willing to work with the new governor and Senate. He'll do everything he can to cooperate," Mark said.

Mark and Craig speak of House politics with an air of familiarity. But after learning from their father and viewing the process more closely than most of their peers, both doubt they will follow in their father's political footsteps.

After Mark finishes his graduate work, he plans to go on to medical school. Craig said he had political aspirations until he saw how campaigns can get negative, and how that can adversely affect a politician's family.

In their own family, they said, their father always sat them down and warned them of the negative implications of political life. "There are going to be some tough times," Mark said, quoting his father.
