Lottery

over-under," Byrne said. "With so many games it would have been easy to consider the lack of interest."

The Sports Action game came into existence in September 1989 and while the Oregon Athletic Department was promised $1 million in the first year, the Athletic Department has received only $150,000.

Sales on other lottery games have been very poor in the last year, and as a provision of Sports Action when it was passed, any time the lottery sales dip below a certain level, money from the Sports Action will be used to cover those losses.

The Athletic Department has benefited by the state board's decision to grant tuition waivers for the University that has resulted in about $600,000 for the Athletic Department. However, Byrne was quick to point out that the University as a whole, not just the Athletic Department, was helped by the decision.

Over the past few years the state system was not meeting its projected income figures and as a result lifted the enrollment caps to create more money for the state colleges and universities, not just their respective athletic programs.

"We're only about one-third of the problem," Byrne said. "When students go to a class that is overly full, it's not because of athletics but because of the shortfall (of the state system) from the previous years."

Both the NFL and NBA have been opposed to the Sports Action game from the start, but with the NBA out of the picture, the chances of Sports Action remaining in Oregon have greatly increased.

Members of Congress have also tried to have the game banned, but through the efforts of Sen. Bob Packwood, R-Ore., the game appears to be safe from any legislation. An attempt to ban the game passed the House of Representatives earlier this fall, but Packwood was able to slip an amendment into an unrelated bill exempting Oregon from the ban.
