Skilled athletes juggle multiple sports talents

U. of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana

Double the pleasure, double the pain. It's the newest, biggest thing at the U. of Arizona and the U. of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana, thanks to a philosophy among coaches that does not discourage students from participating in more than one sport if the opportunity exists.

"It's an altogether different philosophy than other schools," said Jerry Kindell, UA baseball coach.

"A lot of football coaches are very selfish about the sport," said Dick Toney, UA football coach, who allows his players to participate in other sports.

Last spring, one UA football player was on the baseball team and five others ran track. All are important contributors to both sports.

The chief beneficiary from the newest crop of UA football recruits may be Kindell. Three football signees are planning to play baseball this year as well, including Lelene Beber, one of the most highly sought-after baseball recruits in the nation.

UA's willingness to allow the athletes to play two sports has made a difference in recruiting.

"I was interested in Notre Dame," said Beber, a 6-foot-1-inch, 180-pound wide receiver. "But when they found out I wanted to play baseball, they kind of lost interest."

Elbert Turner, the nation's fastest high school hurdler in 1986, signed with the Illinois football team as a receiver but included a letter of intent to run track.

"It's tough when you're out for track and have to step on the football field and start over," he said. "But everything is going to fall into place."

Last track season he was the Big Ten champion in indoor and outdoor track, qualifying for All-Americans in the 80-meter and 110-meter high hurdles. His record demonstrates his ability to jump from a team game like football to an individual challenge like track.

Gripes other coaches have with allowing their players to participate in other sports range from injury risk to missed practice time and time management problems. The UA coaches said they are aware of the potential downsides.

"Some will find they can't handle it, either academically or competitively," Toney said. "When that happens, they have to make a decision. The ones we've got doing it right now are doing a fine job."
