attend the teach-in instead of their classes.

"I encourage faculty to be tolerant and not penalize students for their involvement in discussion of these crucial issues," Brand said.

Brand said his patience has been tested in the last few days because of the war. Oregon is contributing about $85 million to the war effort, and this sum would cover the amount of money being cut from the higher education budget because of the passage of Measure 5, he said.

"We must show respect for all and not war among ourselves. Anti-Semitism and anti-Arab feelings are just not acceptable."

Rob Gould, draft and military counselor for Clergy and Laity Concerned, discussed questions about the possible reinstatement of the draft and how the peace movement aids the troops.

Gould also said it is important to recognize that the way in which pro-war and pro-peace demonstrators support the troops is different.

"Pro-war people mean to say we should support the troops as instruments of war," Gould said. "The peace movement supports the troops as human beings."

done," she said. "(Iraq) would have gotten nuclear weapons. I still want peace, but I think (the war) is necessary."

At all three universities, a majority of surveyed students said they believed a draft would not be necessary to continue the war. But while most of the men surveyed (73 percent) said they did not believe there would be a draft, fewer women surveyed (57 percent) said they believed a draft would not be necessary.

At WSU, 54 percent of the male respondents said they would willingly take part, but only 46 percent from UW and 26 percent from the University said they would willingly take part in a draft.

At the University, more than 37 percent said they would seek other alternatives or not respond at all if they were called up in a draft.

One seemingly contradictory result of the survey was that although the majority of people surveyed supported the United States' decision to attack Iraq, 53 percent didn't consider the loss of 1,000 American lives acceptable as a result of the war.

"No loss of life is acceptable," said sophomore Amber Griffis, a natural resource major at WSU.

"The press talks about only U.S. or allied casualties," UW student Susan Nelson said. "I think people have the impression that we are not bombing people, only chemical weapons plants."

Although the survey may depict a representative sample of opinions from students at all three universities, it is not statistically accurate, said Patricia Gwartney-Gibbs, University associate professor of sociology.

The substitution method (substituting a different name when the original person cannot be contacted) was used when trying to call students for the survey. Gwartney-Gibbs said the substitution method which was used for this survey has problems.

She said in some cases the people who could not be contacted or did not have telephone numbers listed in the student directory may have had something in common.

"I wouldn't do (a substitution method) in my surveys," Gwartney-Gibbs said, but she added the information it provided was still useful.

"Surveys can be useful tools but are only as good as the questions asked," she said.

The poll was organized and written by students at the Washington State Daily Evergreen, the student publication at WSU.
