20 or 30 years," she said. "And the students standing in front of them didn't give a rip about their plight."

So the Athletic Department, besieged by phone calls from season ticketholders who sit directly behind the students, decided to move the band back to its original locale, a move taken after consultation with the ASUO.

"We contacted the ASUO, and they saw no problem with the move," she said.

Walton said she now believes the Athletic Department should have taken the process one step further and informed the students why the move was being made and how it affected the students.

"We want the students on the floor; look where they are at Gill," home of Oregon State basketball, where students are not at court level, she said. "There's no place like the Pit."

Under the new arrangement, students gave up 108 seats in the west bleachers and were compensated with 124 formerly reserved seats split between sections CC and LL, on the main floor, giving the students a net benefit of 16 seats, Walton said.

Christopher Matz, ASUO director of media relations, said he believes a little understanding by both sides would be helpful.

"If we felt it would have caused a controversy, we wouldn't have done it," Matz said. "We could go home and watch (games) on TV if we want to sit down. A little more understanding from the reserved seats around the Pit would help. After all it is the students' team."

And what do band members think of the uproar caused by their move? After all, these students have to show up early at games, and they don't leave until well after most fans are gone, not to mention long hours of practice they put it.

"I don't think the crowd knows the situation," said Joe Mosely, head of logistics and scheduling for the band. "If they did, they might feel different."

Dave Booth, assistant band director, agrees.

"I think people tend to get a little territorial, and that's a little silly," he said.

Mike Snyder, who plays alto saxophone in the band, summed up what seemed to be the pervasive feeling among band members.

"All we want is a little respect," he said.

CELEBRATING FEBRUARY AS BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Brian Lanker
I DREAM A WORLD
Portraits of Black Women Who Changed America

I Dream A World
-BY BRIAN LANKER

"Brian Lanker spent the last two years meeting remarkable women. His portraits of them are full of awe and compassion, even humor, and sometimes love. Most of the women have had to defend themselves from a country that did not always share their dream. These women believed in themselves even as they were undermined by others because they learned from the people who loved them there was nothing they couldn't do."
Ketzell Levine, Weekend Edition, National Public Radio
