for ourselves," Suzuki says. "Other teams see UO as a definite competitor, not just a Club Sports team."

Both teams raise money to travel to competitions by cleaning Autzen Stadium and McArthur Court after athletic events. The water polo players also host a car wash and have bake sales. Crew members have 24-hour row-a-thons in the EMU courtyard and pay $50 in team dues each term. Equipment and transportation costs make crew the most expensive club sport.

from people who I'm sure are good players," he says. "I'd encourage people to get information about Club Sports volleyball as soon as they've registered for classes in the fall."

Skill isn't the only characteristic men's soccer coordinator Ansel Evans is looking for during the team's two-week tryout period.

"We look for commitment and overall skill," he says. Although only 11 men can be on the field at any given time, Evans says he likes to have teams of 18 to 20 players.

"We're very lucky to have a trainer this year," Evans says. The trainer, who also plays on the team, leads the team through what Evans calls "extremely structured" practices that include passing drills and working with movement off of the ball.

The practice and commitment seems to have paid off. Last year the team won seven games, lost two and tied one.

"Every year we've had a good program," Evans says. "Every term we've dropped teams from our schedule that don't have the same level of our commitment we do."

As with virtually all other Club Sports, the soccer team has to raise a lot of its own money. It participates in the McArthur Court and Autzen Stadium clean-ups, but members still have to contribute some of their own money.

"It's a real burden for players to have to pay for uniforms," Evans says.

The soccer season is year-round, with the majority of games played during fall term. Winter term is an indoor season, and the team hosts an indoor tournament and plays whenever it can.

Evans says that in past years many players have taken winter term off to concentrate on school, but this year "the majority of the guys played both fall and winter."

Evans says the team played a great game last Saturday against a team from Portland, coming back from 0-2 to tie 2-2.

The team will play Central Oregon Community College Friday at the Southbank Field, behind Oregon West Fitness and next to the Autzen footbridge.
