UNIVERSITY

Bookstore tries to offer bargains

By Troy Anderson

As spring term winds to an end, the college ritual of students selling their course books back to the University Bookstore will take place May 30 through June 8.

Although the bookstore is offering to pay 60 percent of the discounted new price on books needed for summer or fall terms, students often feel cheated by the amount of money they get paid for their books.

"Their sell-back policies are not fair to students," said junior Keith Marth. "They sell you a new book for about $35, buy it back in the same condition for about $7 and then sell it again used for around $26.

"If they think it's only worth $7 to buy back, then why not sell it for $10 instead of $26?"

The national used-book buyer also will be buying nationally used books in the EMU basement June 3-7.

Jim Williams, the bookstore manager, explained that the bookstore lowers the cost of used texts by buying them back for 60 percent of the purchase price at the end of spring term and then reselling them at 75

If the book is not going to be used the next term or if they are overstocked, the bookstore pays 20 percent of the discounted new price or will not take the book.

For example, the mass media history textbook. Voices of a Nation, costs $48.23 new and $36.17 used. At the end of winter term the bookstore bought back 58 of these books. Students who brought in their books after the quota was met only received $13 or nothing for the book.

The reasons given for not buying books are: 1. the quota has been met. 2. the professor has chosen a new text for the class, 3. the class is not going to be offered again or 4. the book is not used nationally.

Dance set to thank woman's care givers

A dance is being held tonight to thank volunteers who have aided in the recovery of Charlotte Richardson, a former University student who was critically injured in 1989.

Richardson sustained severe head injuries in an accident and has since required intensive therapy and constant care. Part of her treatment includes a hands-on physical therapy program known as "patterning." which requires ten volunteers a day.

Currently, several University students are involved in Richardson's therapy, said Charles Webb, her friend and care giver. However, because many will be gone for the summer, new volunteers are needed. Webb said she is making slow but steady pro-

The dance, at the Eugene Hilton Hotel from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m., is a way to thank the volunteers who currently assist Richardson, as well as an effort to generate interest for others to volunteer, Webb said.

The Grub Street Band will be performing and several Eugene area restaurants have donated food. Admission is free. Richardson will attend from 9:30 to 10 p.m.

Volunteers work in teams of five during two separate daily shifts from 4 to 5 p.m. and from 5 to 6 p.m. For more information on how to become a volunteer, call 484-0185.
