

Tuition for all students skyrockets

Beginning this term, the University will have the second-highest tuition of any public university in the western United States.

In-state law students will pay $5,018 this year, a 40.3 percent increase from last year's cost of $3,576. Non-resident law students will pay $9,446 for the 1991-92 year, a 67.8 percent increase from last year's cost of $5,328.

In addition to raising tuition, the law school had to trim the 1991-92 first-year class to 125 students, down from 180 last year. Further enrollment cuts will follow until 1993-94, when the entire law enrollment will be stabilized at 360 students. This year, 440 law students are enrolled.

The law school cuts and tuition increases were made to decrease the student-to-faculty ratio and augment faculty salaries and student services. The American Bar Association had threatened to remove Oregon's law school from its list of accredited institutions unless these changes were made.

Undergraduate tuition for resident University students will cost $2,598 a year, or $167 more a term. In-state undergrad tuition at the University of California at Berkeley, the most expensive public school in the West, costs only $80 more a year.

Because of Measure 5 cuts, the state system will still have to eliminate or merge 90 academic programs and trim enrollment by 2,000 students at its eight schools.

The following is a summary of other stories the Oregon Daily Emerald covered summer term.

Stacey replaces Colson

Anita Stacey was appointed by the ASUO July 8 to fill the Incidental Fee Committee seat vacated a month ago when Mike Colson was voted out.

A fourth-year English major, Stacey will complete the final year of the two-year term Colson was elected to in spring 1990. She was one of 16 applicants for the position on the seven-member committee that allocates student fees to the athletic department, the EMU and more than 90 student groups.

A former Panhellenic Council president, Stacey was selected because of her involvement in campus activities and her attitude toward relations between the IFC and student groups, said ASUO President Jennifer Bills.

Colson was voted out of office by the IFC on June 1 following nearly four months of debate over his possible role in altering IFC meeting minutes.

Casanova Center opens

After years of being hidden away in the tiny confines of McArthur Court and Gerlinger Hall, the entire athletic department has moved into the spacious Len Casanova Athletic Center next door to Autzen Stadium.

Although the $11.7 million, 102,000-square foot building, named after the former Oregon football coach and athletic director, still has some work left to be completed, the entire athletic department moved in at the end of June, and an open house was held Aug. 21.

The new facility has already had its own brush with controversy. Athletic Director Bill Byrne ordered a set of sports sculptures at the front of the building cut down after he decided the sculptures did not fit in with the rest of the complex.

The action angered the sculptures' creator, Massachusetts artist George Greenamyre.

THE FAR SIDE By GARY LARSON

The herd moved in around him, but Zach had known better than to approach these animals without his trusty buffalo gum.
