Women's League, NOW, and NARAL.

"We got burned once with David Souter, and we're not willing to do it again," Widoff said. "We're not interested in sitting quietly by while women's rights are being eroded."

Another concern expressed at the rally was Thomas' apparent lack of concern for affirmative action and equal opportunity.

Thomas' track record in the public system has been almost totally against what the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has stood for in the last 82 years, said Greg Evans, President of Oregon/Washington NAACP Council.

"We did extensive research on the judge's record going back to his full public record ... We found Thomas not only inconsistent on his posture of affirmative action and equal opportunities, but he was resistant to it," Evans said.

what to do, Hausman said.

The lawsuit may not have been the best method of changing animal research policies, he said.

"I think the lawsuit further polarizes the two groups, and that educating each other and learning from each other might have accomplished more," he said.

Hausman also said much has changed at the University since the lawsuit was first filed in 1988. A prime example is Hausman's appointment to the IACUC, a move he calls "a great gesture of faith" by Moseley and the University.

"This is the first time an animal-rights activist has been appointed to an animal-care-and-use committee anywhere in the country," he said.

A similar case, brought by PETA and SETA, has been brought to Lane County Circuit Court. The suit targets the IACUC's approval of Dr. Richard Marrocco's research on macaque monkeys.

"Clarence Thomas has shown arrogant disregard for women, minorities, and senior citizens," he said.

Evans said the NAACP voted to oppose the nomination of Thomas 49-1. He said that "electing Thomas would be a reactionary judgeship — one that is not going to be tolerant of civil liberties as outlined in the constitution."

Carmen Yokum of the Older Women's league also accused Thomas of discriminating against older people while he was in charge of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Linda Zukitis, co-chair of the National Lawyers Guild, said that while Thomas was in charge of EEOC, he said he "forgot" 78 discrimination claims filed by senior citizens. Thomas then changed his figure to 900, and finally to 7,500 claims. Congress learned later the number was actually 9,000.

All speakers asked people to call their senators and urge them to oppose Thomas' nomination for the Supreme Court. The Senate Judiciary Committee will vote Friday on whether to recommend Thomas to the full Senate.
