Young scientists explore WISTEC natural wonders

Stephen Kuhn didn't notice the roar of 30,000 Duck fans at nearby Autzen Stadium Saturday from where he stood outside the Willamette Institute of Science and Technology. The 11-year-old was too busy learning about insects.

Stephen was one of three participants in WISTEC's first Saturday Science Camp, where children can get hands-on experience with everything from lasers to video microscopes, while their parents attend Duck home games.

"The main objective is to have kids have a fun time with science, to give them a positive experience with science," said Mark Dow, WISTEC assistant director, who ran the camp.

Down said he believes children often don't get a chance to become interested in science because of the way it is taught in schools.

"They're not going to be excited about sitting around in a classroom listening to someone in a foreign language talking to them about science," he said.

And Saturday's camp was anything but a lecture. Kids rolled up their sleeves and actively participated in measuring the speed of sound, reflecting lasers, viewing insect wings under a video microscope, examining walking sticks (insects that evade predators because they look like twigs) and exploring the life in the natural environment surrounding WISTEC, a non-profit science center.

Debbi Kuhn, Stephen's mother, was glad to have something for him to do during the game besides staying home and watching a video. "In fact, he's asked us a number of times if he can do it again already," she said the night after the game.

WISTEC is open to the public five days a week, but Kuhn said the camp provided more than the typical WISTEC visit.

"This time there were a lot of behind the scenes things and activities that he's never gotten to see before," she said.

Saturday Science Camps will also be held for the Nov. 2 and 23 Duck home games. Children can be dropped off as early as noon and picked up after the games. Parents are encouraged to preregister their kids by contacting WISTEC, said Business Manager Sally Tatala. The price is $6 for members and $10 for non-members, Tatala said.
