the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, areas the Palestinians claim as their homeland.

Sharoni said she has undergone a painful process of unlearning the one-sided history she was raised with.

"I look for a new language now that politicians do not speak," she said.

Abu-Nimer said dialogue often revolves around interpretations of history.

"Jews are raised to believe that this land was designated and determined for Jews; that the Palestinians have no right," Abu-Nimer said. "The typical education for a Jewish kid is the same kind of thing that my grandfather said to me.

"But we don't want to engage in this going back and forth in history."

Jews in Israel and the United States must ask themselves

what kind of Israel they want to see, Sharoni said.

She said many Palestinians were displaced recently to make way for the Soviet Jews who immigrated to Israel.

"This is apartheid," she said. "I feel this in my blood, that this is racism.

"It's very difficult for my father to unlearn that," she said. "But the Holocaust is not measured in terms of how many people were killed. A holocaust means that because you look a certain way, that your life is not as precious."

Both agree that the upcoming Middle East peace talks are a step in the right direction, although they did not express much optimism that the outcome will be significant. But as Sharoni pointed out, "I'd rather have them hanging out at the negotiating table than killing each other on the battlefield."

Red Cross, he said.

While the staff of the Daily Californian watched the events unfold at close range, Francesca Vogl, one of the many University of Oregon students from the Bay area, spent the last two days worrying and waiting for news about her family and friends.

Vogl, a native of Piedmont, a town just near Oakland, said her parents were evacuated Sunday when the fire got to within four blocks of their home.

"My dad said last night that people would fly by in helicopters and that's how they knew they had to evacuate," she said. "People would fly overhead and announce it. He said it was kind of like being in a war zone — everything was black, helicopters were dumping chemicals and telling people to evacuate."

Retirement should be everything you dreamed it would be. With good health, you may spend a quarter of your life doing the things you've always dreamed of — like travelling the world, starting your own business, or playing tennis twelve months a year.
