SCULPTURE

Artist George Greenamyre, who created the statues, said the drawings he submitted where representational to what the sculpture would look like when in place.

"There should have been no surprises," he said.

Greenamyre said he is happy with the new location, but he added that moving the sculpture to its new home on the south side of the Casanova Center is still in the planning stage.

The moving costs, estimated at $31,000, include $4,000 that Greenamyre will receive for revised drawings and $27,000 for the relocation work.

On Friday, Remington announced that an anonymous group of donors came forward to pay the cost of the relocation. The donors have given money to the athletic department in the past.

The University had originally planned to pay for the relocation costs with money from the auxiliary parking fund because the athletic department already has a deficit of $1.7 million.

"Those funds were extra reserves that could be used for a variety of facility improvement needs," Remington said. "If you looked at all possible uses for the money, I don't think you could necessarily say this was the 'best' use."

"But the administration felt it was an appropriate use."

ROTC

"The University is in violation of the rule that prohibits sexual discrimination by virtue of allowing military recruiters on campus," Drescher said.

Drescher said the decision is a good first step, but that she hopes the higher education system sticks to what it is saying.

"I think it's a good step forward," Drescher said. "I commend the chancellor and the board and encourage them to take concrete steps to implement the principles and the values they had expressed in the paper."

"The point is that the higher education system makes all these statements supporting gay rights but we haven't seen any concrete actions to back it up."

Drescher said she thinks the University should follow a plan that would give ROTC some sort of deadline when they will no longer be allowed on campus.

Lt. Col. James Hinton, head of the University's military science department, said his department has to follow the policies of the U.S. military.

"If the chancellor wants the policy changed, he is going about it the right way," he said.
