

RECRUIT

clear signal that Myles Brand isn't willing to acknowledge decisions made by elected student leaders," Dockstader said. "It will signal that all his talk about discrimination and a University for everyone is just lip service and rhetoric."

Until Brand decides whether the board's policy will be implemented, the EMU's policy on recruiters will remain a hot topic of debate.

EMU director Adell McMillan, who is appealing the board's decision to Brand, said recruiters will be allowed to remain in the EMU until Brand makes a decision.

But board members interpret the situation differently. "Our policy stands until it is vetoed," Deckert said.

President Brand said he has not yet received McMillan's appeal, but will act quickly when he does. He would not comment on the board's decision Thursday.

Although it is McMillan's job to implement policy set by the board of directors, she said she cannot implement this policy because it conflicts with her scheduling responsibilities.

"I cannot abide by the board's decision," McMillan said.

The EMU board does not make scheduling policy or University policy, with which military recruiters have complied.

The recruiters have signed an affirmative action statement with Career Planning and Placement Services, the department that schedules tables for them at the EMU. However, that statement specifically says the military doesn't fully comply with the affirmative action guidelines.

"As a University administrator, I am obliged to abide by University policy," McMillan said. "Any department may schedule in this building. They signed the statement."

If the decision is upheld by the University, it would be subject to constitutional questions, particularly on First Amendment grounds, said University attorney Peter Swan.

MARINES

Edgington said the times when he speaks to the most students are usually those when people are protesting near his table. "The volume of students around my table definitely increases then. I don't mind talking to people with a different point of view as long as it is an intelligent, informed discussion."

For example, when students were protesting near his table during Gay Pride week last year, Edgington said that he spoke to more people that day than he did during the entire year.

Edgington also recalled the day the World Peace and Disarmament group set up a table near his, and "the students who were protesting and those who disagreed almost got into a fistfight. Verbal blows were exchanged, but no physical ones," Edgington said.

"Sometimes, students think it's great fun to walk by my table, take an information packet, slip something derogatory into it, and put it back on the table," Edgington said. "They never stick around to see what happens. Usually, I just walk over and take it out, or I leave it there — it's not going to hurt anything. I guess they think that they've scored a great moral victory by doing that."

Edgington said on the whole, his reception at the University has been a friendly one. "I think it helps that I'm a University graduate, and an Oregon native. Also, I'm open to all views."

Edgington said his job, like all jobs, has its ups and downs. "It's got its politics and bureaucracy, and its good, average and poor officers and enlisted people."

When asked about the proposal before the EMU board to ban military recruiters from the EMU, he said, "It seems to be a small group of students who want to ban recruiters, and I think they should take into account the entire student body — the silent majority. They should look at all viewpoints and not just their own."

He added it was not the military that set the policy stating that "people of alternative lifestyles are not conducive to a military environment," but rather, the policy was set by Congress. "We have to follow their policy," he said, "whether we agree or not."

"I like to think of the philosopher who said, more or less, 'I may not agree with what you say or do, but I will fight to the death to defend your right to say it,'" Edgington said. "Unfortunately, people don't always allow me the same respect."

Edgington said he would like to command a group of young men and women someday, probably as a battalion commander in charge of 750 to 1,000 people. He is also interested in advanced degree work either in engineering or management.

"I'd just like to continue my education and my marketability," Edgington said. "I'll be gone from the military someday, and I'll have to find another job someplace else."
