CLARIFICATION

A story in Wednesday's Emerald about campus bicycle policies may have led readers to believe that Office of Public Safety officers will impound bicycles that are not registered and sell them at auction.

Carey Drayton, OPS director, said notices will be taped to unregistered bikes, reminding their owners to register bikes with his office. Registering a bike with OPS is free.

Drayton said a recovered stolen bike that is registered is easier to return to its owner, whereas returning an unregistered bike is difficult.

"We don't have the will or the energy to cut peoples' locks," Drayton said. "We're not out to make a million dollars. We're out to promote public safety and the public good."

Drayton said OPS officers will impound bicycles if they are parked illegally or interfere with a building's disabled access. Impounded bikes will be returned to their owners, Drayton said, adding that OPS will accept registering the bike in lieu of a citation.

"That's the last thing on my mind is impounding bikes," he said. "It is stated in the regulations that people need to register their bikes. Again, it costs nothing to do so."

The Emerald regrets any confusion Wednesday's article may have caused.

and Pacific Studies umbrella are: East Asian Languages and Literatures, International Business, International Studies and Pacific Island Studies.

Despite the programs' successes, Ayres said they receive little outside financial support, and, like the rest of the University, they are scrambling to make ends meet in the wake of Measure 5.

Ayres said plans to add faculty with specialties in Asian nations other than Japan and China have been put on hold.

The number of students in the program is also expected to remain at present levels, Ayres said, because students in the Asian Studies program need extensive advising, and faculty members are already overburdened.

"We're working on a proposal to raise funds, with help from the University of Oregon Foundation, to establish endowed chairs, hold conferences and offer study in specific disciplines," he said. "The goal is to serve a wider variety of students."

For more information about 50th anniversary activities, contact the Asian Studies program, 346-5087.
