UNIVERSITY

Sick of the University?
Get credit at the coast

By Carrie Dennett
Emerald Associate Editor

Sometimes months of overcrowded classes, not enough parking spaces and passing the EMU everyday can be too much to handle. Short of transferring to another campus, there is another option for undergraduates who need a break.

The University's Oregon Institute of Marine Biology offers an opportunity for 40 students to live on the coast spring term while earning University credit.

The small fishing village of Charleston and the Oregon coast serve as the classroom for upper and lower division courses in political science, geography, landscape architecture and marine biology.

In addition to the small, informal classes, students earn a minimum of five credits in an independent, interdisciplinary project of their choosing.

Anjse Burdick, campus director of the "People and the Oregon Coast" program, said the education students receive in their term at the coast is unlike anything found on campus.

"You become on a first name basis with your instructors, which is very different," she said.

"You can choose projects that actually have a budget, you can actually make a difference," Burdick said. "It's not like doing a paper."

Past projects include a hiking

'At the beginning of the term, everyone goes home for the weekend, but by the end of the term, no one leaves. People become like family.'

— Anjse Burdick

trail guide, a survey of old-growth foresting methods, and an emergency disaster plan for the Charleston area.

Students in the program study and live in a small, modern campus with a dormitory, cafeteria, class buildings, instructor cabins and a sand volleyball court.
