Mass murderer suffers victims' fate 25 years later

JOLIET, Ill. (AP) — Mass murderer Richard Speck, who shocked the nation in 1966 by stabbing and strangling eight student nurses, died Thursday. Friends and relatives of his victims expressed relief and bitterness.

"I think that it's a shame that it's taken this long for him to leave this earth," said Betty Jo Purvis, sister of victim Patricia Ann Matusek.

Speck was pronounced dead, one day shy of his 50th birthday, at Silver Cross Hospital, near the Stateville Correctional Center where he had been held for nearly 24 years, said Corrections Department spokesman Nic Howell.

"Judgment day has finally arrived for that sucker," said retired police officer Jack Wallenda, one of the first on the murder scene. "And he died an easy death ... he should have suffered a lot more than he did."

The murders took place at a residence near South Chicago Community Hospital School of Nursing.

Speck broke in late at night and repeatedly told the young women he only wanted money and wasn't going to hurt anyone. But he then bound them with bed sheets and led them one by one to other rooms and killed them.
