STREETWISE

QUESTION:

What can the University do to make students of color feel more comfortable on campus?

"(The University should) gear things toward more of a broader application of subjects and make the community more aware."

--Stephen Mosley
graduate, pre-law

"Further outreach by the Black Student Union and possibly contacting students of color as they come on campus would help them feel more comfortable."

--Nabil Pike
freshman, english

"I think (the ethnic studies class requirement) is a step toward understanding different cultures and societies. I think we need to stress diversity more."

--Audrey Lee
junior, pre-business

"The classes they offer should be oriented more toward people of color. The University of Oregon particularly lacks some of the curriculum desired for people of color."

--Duc Ly
senior, architecture

"What the University can do is continue to make strides in race relations. If the University can avoid sanctioning racism that will help, but it still has to be an individual effort."

--Sid Moore
senior, political science

"I think there should be better recruits, more multicultural events, and maybe the president can make himself available to people of color."

--Thomas Lee
senior, computer science
