many breakfasts with University President Myles Brand. They hope to convince him to grow back his mustache, and they'd also like Brand to let their friends attend the University free of charge.

"We'd charge them a small fee that would be put to good use," Morgan said.

But they say they are completely honest and trustworthy — "We will openly misappropriate funds," Pharis said.

Former ASUO vice president JoSonja Watson resigned last month after a long public ordeal during which her police records were made public by the media. Pharis and Morgan said they have nothing to hide — they are perfectly willing to make their police records public.

But Pharis said they don't have anything in their past that would bring them down.

"It's just typical college hi-jinks," Pharis said. "We were cited for the same thing on the same evening once, which proves how compatible we are."

Pharis and Morgan said that if their opponents, Bobby Lee and Karmen Fore, don't run a negative campaign, they would consider giving them positions in the ASUO. Lee, who has three years of ASUO experience, could help them figure out how the student government office runs, Morgan said.

But they aren't interested in learning too much from those who are already in the ASUO.

"We both feel that student government no longer represents the students here," Pharis said. "We both really feel that experience in student government is a hindrance."

Morgan points to low voter turnout during ASUO elections — less than 20 percent last year — as a sign that the ASUO is only representing a small fraction of the students.

"We really think that sheds some light on the state of political affairs around here," he said. "We're going to give student government back to the students."

Pharis noted that if they can tap into the "apathy vote," they'll win by a landslide.

Morgan said they are open to suggestions.

"Above all, we don't want to offend anyone," he said. "If anyone is so serious that they're offended by us, then they're missing the point."
