Forum brings world to Eugene

They speak several different languages and live in completely different areas, but students, professors, attorneys, activists and scientists from around the world are uniting this week at the University for one common concern: the environment.

The 10th annual Public Interest Law Conference, entitled "Environmental Alternatives: Grass Roots to Global," kicked off Thursday with a luncheon for the international guests and speakers.

The conference, which is open to the public, will continue through this weekend at the University Law Center.

Attracting more than 1,000 guests from across North America and throughout the world, the conference is an opportunity for representatives of the different countries to share their experiences and expertise.

"The conference is a good chance to communicate and exchange different opinions," said Yuri Udodov of the Russian Federation.

Matthew Baird, an Australian environmental lawyer, said he believes the conference is an inspirational and informational opportunity.

"There is a feeling here that despite huge environmental problems, there is the strength and commitment to keep going," Baird said. "Also, I wanted to see the strategies the American public interest lawyers are using."

Although all representatives said they believe the environment is in danger, some of the guests from the developing countries said the conference is a rare opportunity for them to gain information about the environment.

Chilean representative Eduardo Astorga said his country is in need of environmental laws.

"In Chile, our laws are very old and disorderly," Astorga said. "The conference is a good place to receive environmental information because in Chile, we haven't hardly any information (concerning environmental issues), like books or newspapers."

The conference will feature panel discussions on more than 80 topics, including environmental laws of individual countries, the Exxon Valdez oil spill, environmental legislation and mining laws.

Many of the representatives see global warming and energy consumption as the major environmental concerns facing the world today.
