students wouldn't have gone to the office out of fear that they would be targeted for investigation.

Bills also could have written a letter to the Emerald editor for free, but she said she chose to place the ad because she didn't believe the paper would print her letter.

"The Emerald doesn't support students' rights to protest," she said.

Don Peters, Emerald editorial editor, said the paper prints every letter that is 250 words or less and not libelous.

Bobby Lee, ASUO president-elect, said he believed the ad was a wise use of student money.

In addition to placing the ad, Bills' office has compiled a list of six local lawyers willing to represent students facing federal investigation. The lawyers will not charge for their services. Bills refused to give their names to the Emerald.

Bills also released a statement to the media Monday saying the investigation was an "attempt at harassing and scapegoating students."

In the statement, she incorrectly implied that the offending students could face as much as a 10-year prison sentence.

"Penalties like 10 years usually involve murder," Sheldahl said. "Whoever said this has not done his or her homework."

For a suspect to receive a 10-year sentence, a judge would likely require multi-million dollars worth of damage, multiple felony convictions and significant prison time, Sheldahl said.

Assuming the defendants don't have previous misdemeanor or criminal convictions, the legal guidelines would suggest a sentence of 10 to 16 months of federal incarceration.

But Sheldahl said those guidelines may vary with different circumstances for each case. For instance, Sheldahl said, if a defendant pleads guilty and accepts responsibility, then the suggested sentence would become six to 12 months.

Bills was unavailable to comment on why her estimates of the possible sentence were inaccurate.

institutions charge, which can be as much as $800.

People with physical and learning disabilities can find helpful resources through ALS's Educational Opportunities Program, which also helps low-income students and students whose parents did not graduate from four-year colleges.

Besides teaching skills to improve academic performance, EOP also provides counselors to help students whose personal problems could hinder their scholastic achievement.

However, because of limited funding, not everyone eligible can receive the program's benefits: applicants are screened, with assistance given to those who need it most.

The wide range of options offered by ALS brings about many different types of students.

"A very diverse group of students use our services," Lesyk said. "We work with freshmen through graduate students, and we see a number of international students, especially in the writing lab."

The writing lab is particularly popular around class paper deadlines, said Michael Haddigan, a tutor at the lab.

"(The students) really come in right before a paper is due," Haddigan said. "You see a line of people coming in."

Kim Lilley, ALS tutorial supervisor, said the occasional long wait for tutors would be prevented if students planned their time more wisely.

"Unfortunately, many students do not plan ahead for midterms and finals," Lilley said. "Consequently, at these times, an unusually large number of students seek drop-in help."

For those who desire more attention than the drop-in basis allows, and are willing to pay a fee, ALS also offers small-group tutoring. Designed for groups of three to four, and at a cost of $60 a term per participant, students can be tutored in nearly every area of study.

However, students in the less popular classes may not find a tutor at the program in their area of study. This is because tutors are mainly hired for classes with the highest demand, Lesyk said.

"If a student wants a tutor in courses other than those that are in high demand, then we consult our database."

The database is a computer list of qualified student tutors. This service, called the Registry, provides a student with up to three names of qualified students willing to tutor students in the less popular classes. The student and tutor then negotiate fees, usually between $5 and $7 an hour for lower-division work, and $6 and $10 an hour for upper-division work.

ALS tutors are required to have at least two faculty references. The math tutors are usually undergraduates skilled through calculus, with some experience in statistics. The writing tutors are usually first-year graduate students who will be teaching Writing 121 or 122. Many of the writing tutors are experienced journalists, or high school or college writing teachers.

The tutors consider their work a good work-study job, because it pays more than many jobs.

"(The tutors) like their jobs," Lesyk said. "We don't have a high turnover rate."

The tutors for the math and writing labs are available Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., in rooms 51 and 59 PLC.

DUCK CALL

IntroDUCKtion, so fewer classes may be available.

Also beginning fall term, the last day to withdraw from classes and get a 100-percent refund will be Friday, Sept. 25, the last business day before classes begin. In the past, students were eligible for a full refund through the first day of classes.

Johnson said Oregon State Board of Higher Education policy sets the full refund deadline at the day before classes begin, but the University was excepted from the rule because arena registration made it impossible to drop courses until the first day of class.

Students who register before Sept. 11 will be mailed a Student Schedule and Tuition Billing Statement on Sept. 15. Students who register later will need to pick up their statements at the registrar's office.

Students can expect to register on one of these days:

- Graduate students — May 18
- Seniors — May 18 to 20
- Juniors — May 20 to 22
- Sophomores — May 26 to 27
- Freshmen — May 27 to 28
- Community Ed — Sept. 1
