REVIEW

Director David Fincher comes from a history of making music videos and it shows. There are tons of close-ups, quick cuts and skewed camera angles. Most of these are more distracting than enhancing.

The look isn't all bad - it's just too deliberately gloomy. It seems as if only grays and browns were used in the production design.

Ripley is made to be mythic and overtly Christ-like in this movie. Instead of getting down to the business of scaring the audience, this movie prefers to simplistically show Ripley as a savior.

Unfortunately, too, the filmmakers do nothing to try and explore the potential of the plot. The fact that all the supporting actors and actresses are condemned to live out their lives in a dark hell is not examined.

The movie's biggest flaw is its lack of any real scares. While the first two movies spent the long, slow periods building suspense, this one is just long and slow.

The movie is not all bad, though. Every action seems deliberate and believable, and the camerawork - lighting aside - is fast paced and often exciting.

But overall, those expecting the power and terror of the first two movies can forget it. This one falls short.
