If the weather is good, the class of 1992 won't have to be inside McArthur Court, like the 1934 graduates did.

You're out; time to celebrate

For those who are graduating this term, things can be hectic enough with classes, deadlines and finals, to even start thinking about the graduation ceremony.

But don't worry because the University has a ceremony planned especially to complement the atmosphere of the school.

"The ceremony is for them (the graduates)," said Mary Hudzikiewicz, assistant director of student development. "We try to make it festive not formal. You don't have to sit in alphabetical order. The day is for them."

So the graduate doesn't need to stress about knowing the proper graduation etiquette. The University wants the ceremony to be an enjoyable way to recognize the graduates.

The ceremony is noon Sunday, June 14 at Autzen Stadium. If it rains on this day it will be held in McArthur Court.

The admission is free, but the only drawback is if it rains the graduates have four tickets to give to their guests for the ceremony in McArthur Court due to the limited seating.

Graduates need not worry if they have already invited 20 of their closest friends and relatives to the ceremony because the University has only held it at McArthur Court once in the last twenty years, according to Hudzikiewicz.

"There will be about 18,000 guests and 1,800 graduates at the ceremony, that's why we don't fit into McArthur Court," Hudzikiewicz said.

If it's a sunny day, it might be interesting for undergraduates to go and see what they will soon be experiencing themselves. The air is sure to be charged with pure joy as the graduates complete the last step of their University experience.

During the ceremony, every group of degrees will be recognized, with a special recognition for the Ph.D students. Not every student's name will be read, so the ceremony is expected to last about two hours instead of 20.

University President Myles Brand will present the University awards for this academic year including a posthumous degree to Michael Boss, a graduate student who died one month before he received his Ph.D.

The speaker for the ceremony is N. Scott Momaday, a Pulitzer Prize-winning native American author. Momaday is a member of the Kiowa tribe and an English professor at the University of Arizona.

The class of 1942 will be recognized during the ceremony to continue the tradition of inviting back the class that graduated 50 years ago. Hudzikiewicz said there will be approximately 70 members of the class attending.

Diplomas will not be handed out during the actual ceremony. The degrees will be conferred beforehand so the graduates don't need to stress whether they made it or not. The graduates will have to wait 10 to 12 weeks to get the diplomas by mail.

After the ceremony is over, many departments have their own celebrations and receptions to honor their students. This tradition has been started because "most students identify with their majors," Hudzikiewicz said.

"This is an opportunity for a smaller setting," she said, adding it allows the students to get more personal recognition from their department and faculty.

Enjoy commencement and congratulations to the graduating seniors!
