All Ducks move on in NCAAs

Kim Hyatt has been known for taking her time to reach the NCAA Championships during her four seasons at Oregon.

But once she reached the NCAAs, the senior javelin thrower wasted no time Thursday making her name known at the national meet in Austin, Texas, qualifying for the Saturday final with a toss of 174-2, the best throw of the day.

Hyatt, a three-time All-American, didn't automatically qualify for the NCAAs until the Last Chance Open last week at Hayward Field. During her freshman and sophomore years as a Duck, she also didn't qualify for the national championships until the month of May.

Were Hyatt able to repeat her past performances at the NCAA meet, she would become the first women's javelin thrower in NCAA history to be a four-time All-American.

Last year, Nicole Woodward came within 61 hundredths of a second of making the finals in the 5,000 at the NCAA meet, and Thursday, the Oregon junior was the final entrant allowed into the Saturday final after running to seventh in her heat in a time of 17:01.78.

Teammate Lucy Nusrala fared better, however, placing fourth during her 5,000 heat in a 16:51.08 time. Nusrala had the second-best time in the country last season, but she only took 10th at the national meet.

Sprinter Camara Jones set a school record 52.40 in her 400-meter heat at the NCAA meet Wednesday, and the sophomore will try to improve on that this afternoon when she runs in the semifinals of the event.

On the men's side, Bob Gray qualified for the 110-hurdles semifinals today by finishing third Thursday in 13.85 during his heat. Gray, who also moved past the 400 preliminaries Wednesday, will run both the 100 and the 400 semifinals today.

Also today, decathletes Pedro daSilva and Muhammad Oliver will begin their first day of competition. daSilva has the top collegiate score in the country, and Oliver finished fourth at the NCAAs last year.

Oregon steeplechasers Rick Mestler and Tye Van Schoiack, who both moved past the semifinals Wednesday, will run in the steeple final tonight. Mestler took fifth and Van Schoiack finished seventh in last season's final meet.

Pat Haller was scheduled to run in the men's 5,000 preliminaries Thursday, but because of the low number of runners entered, only the Saturday final will be run.

Clyde: Air's shooting a horror show

CHICAGO (AP) — The NBA Finals were supposed to be a showdown between the NBA's best two players, Michael Jordan and Clyde Drexler.

Drexler, a distant second to Jordan in the Most Valuable Player voting, was supposed to have an edge in three-point shooting ability.

Jordan even admitted as much, noting his own 27-for-100 three-point shooting in the regular season while Drexler made 114 of 338.

By halftime Wednesday night, Jordan had 35 of his 39 points and was six of nine from three-point range, burying the Portland Trail Blazers in a cascade of emotion.

"It seemed like a horror story," Drexler said after the Chicago Bulls' 122-89 victory in Game 1 of the NBA Finals. "You don't take it personally."

But he thinks Jordan might have.

Asked if the constant comparisons between himself and Jordan before the series inspired Jordan, Drexler said, "I think so."

But Drexler said there was no trash-talking going on between the two Olympians.

"Michael and I are out there to help our teams," Drexler said. "We aren't out there to jaw back and forth with each other."

While Jordan was setting a championship series record with 35 first-half points, Drexler managed only eight points on three-for-nine shooting.

Drexler finished with 16 points on five-for-14 shooting and seven assists. He rarely displayed the air-walking athleticism that led to his comparisons with Jordan.

"I don't think we ever got into our offense," Drexler said. "We never got set up, including me."

Jordan was 14 of 21 from the field in the first half, tying a finals record for field goals in the first two periods.

"The guy was shooting the ball incredibly well from the outside," Drexler said. "Nobody counted on him hitting all those three-pointers. There was nothing we could do about that. I'm going to give him those same shots in Game 2, as a matter of fact."
