Three new administrators on tap

EUGENE (AP) — University of Oregon officials are planning to spend $175,000 on three new administrative positions despite fears that budget cuts will force the elimination of 400 jobs.

Two part-time associate dean positions have been replaced with three full-time associate deans in a reorganization in the College of Arts and Sciences, officials said.

The reorganization comes as the university is planning for a possible 20-percent drop in state funding beginning next summer because of the Measure 5 property tax limit.

University President Myles Brand said creating the new administrative positions makes sense.

"Sometimes you have to spend more money to do a better job," Brand said. "To undermanage such an enormous college is a mistake. The previous administrative structure didn't work."

The College of Arts and Sciences serves a majority of the university's 16,000 students. It includes more than 30 departments and programs.

The college's $32 million budget last year was larger than the budget for entire regional campuses, such as Western Oregon State College in Monmouth or Southern Oregon State College in Ashland.

ing the session beyond one day.

That prompted Campbell to drop the gavel on the session.

The final tally had 10 Democrats and 23 Republicans opposed to the proposal.

After the House vote, Roberts said the Legislature had done a disservice to Oregon citizens by not giving them the chance to vote on a good tax plan.

"I think the people of Oregon lost," she said.

Before the plan reached the House, the House Revenue and School Finance Committee removed the portion of the proposal calling for a Sept. 15 referendum. Without a specified date, the plan would have appeared on the November ballot.

By 1 p.m., the proposal had reached the floor of the House with legislators still split over the date.

On the House floor, Rep. Vera Katz, D-Portland, said a November vote would allow voters more time to consider the proposal.

"The public would want as long a time as possible to debate ... a plan that will change their lives for a long time," Katz said.

However, supporters of the Sept. 15 election argued that it was important to vote on the proposal apart from the other issues and candidates that will appear on the November ballot.

"We've got to take the politics out of this," said Rep. Tom Mason, D-Portland. "And if this body sends it out with the November date, it has not taken the politics out of it."

PROTEST

Lisa Hartrich, the CAH member who dressed as a Klan member.

"At the same time Springfield is requiring legal discrimination against the lesbian and gay community, the Supreme Court is saying it is a free speech right to burn crosses on people of color's property," she said. "We need civil rights for a truly just system of justice."

While members of the group did hand out leaflets outlining their position, the constant drizzle kept onlookers to a minimum. Motorists driving by on Seventh Avenue and Pearl Street got an eyeful however, as they tried to make sense of the out-of-place figures on the corner. A handful were impressed and gave the group a polite honk and a thumbs-up while the demonstration seemed to draw blank stares from most onlookers. Members were not deterred by the confusion they may have caused in some people's minds.

"Hey, that's fine. That's a good reaction. As long as people take notice that's great," said Ward in response to one motorist who slowed down long enough to scream obscenities at the would-be white supremacists.

Communities Against Hate is a project of Clergy and Laity Concerned that works for human rights in the local community. The group also does research on local 'hate groups', holds workshops and works as a victim advocacy organization.

Although the group would like to see legislation changed in favor of victims of civil rights violations, it doesn't see its role as being political. The purpose of the demonstration, as well as the group's other functions, is to educate.

"We are here to make people aware of hate in the community and in this direction," Ward said. "A community that understands and is knowledgeable about these things is better prepared to deal with them when they come up."
