Many methods of dealing with harassment available

By Meg Dedolph
Emerald Contributor

Harassment comes in many forms, from malicious comments based on gender, race or sexual orientation to a catcall or whistle on the street.

If a student thinks he or she is being harassed or discriminated against in any way, there are a variety of organizations and services within the University designed to help.

They include the mediation programs to the student advocacy service provided through the ASUO. The phone numbers for these groups are listed in the University Student Directory phone book.

- The Sexual Harassment Resource Network serves as a starting point for students seeking advice concerning sexual harassment or discrimination.

The list of faculty and staff members available through the network for help and guidance includes people from many academic departments. It is designed so that students can find a person that they might know and with whom they might feel more comfortable discussing their problem with.

- The Dean of Students Office also provides drop-in counseling from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. daily designed to help students who think they are being harassed.

Students can then choose to handle their problem in one of many ways. Problems that result from poor communications, such as a roommate dispute, are often handled through the Mediation Program — a free service to faculty, staff and students.

Jacquie Gibson, director of the program, said the program has handled student group conflicts, conflicts within academic departments and family and divorce-related issues.

- The Office of Student Advocacy is another place students can seek help on harassment issues. The program, directed by Marlene Drescher, is staffed by third-year law students.

This program deals mostly with complaints directed against the University or University personnel, and Drescher said it keeps the student's best interests in mind.

"We're advocating for that student," she said.

The work done by this office may include helping a student write a letter of complaint, informing the student as to his or her options, and producing the best remedy to the problem.

- Harassment issues that arise between two students, either on or off campus, are usually dealt with under the Student Conduct Code.

Incidents that occur off campus are more difficult to handle, said Student Conduct Coordinator Elaine Green, since it must be proven in these cases that the incident hindered the victim's ability to function in his or her role on campus.
