COLORADO

next step was to take the movement statewide, said Colorado for Family Values Director Kevin Tebedo.

In a six-month period, the group collected 84,475 registered-voter signatures, well over the 49,279 required by state law to place the measure on the ballot.

"We slam dunked it," Tebedo said, adding that opposition by political leaders such as Rep. Pat Schroeder have not hurt the campaign.

"We saw a jump in support," he said. "Nobody likes Pat Schroeder. When Pat Schroeder came out against Amendment 2, it was not a detriment. She is not a force in that avenue."

While Tebedo admitted there is currently no statewide protection for gays and lesbians as individuals, he said his group believes it is necessary to draw a clear and permanent line between civil rights and special rights.

"There's a protection for them as a man or woman," he said. There's protection for them under their religious beliefs. There is protection under age. So there's all kinds of protection for those individuals

"So when they say there are currently no protections for homosexuals in the state of Colorado," Tebedo said, "they are right in as much as there is no law based on the way they have sex."

While the rhetoric surrounding the issue may sound the same in both states, Tebedo is quick to point out that his group is not affiliated with the Oregon Citizens Alliance or any national movement.

"(The anti-gay rights movement) is just individual states doing individual things," he said.

Tebedo said Colorado for Family Values did learn from the OCA's successful 1988 campaign to rescind then-Gov. Neil Goldschmidt's executive order prohibiting discrimination against homosexuals in state government.

McCallum disputed Tebedo's claim that there is no connection between the groups.

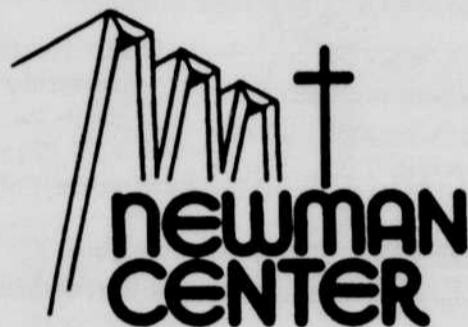

"Lou Sheldon was here during the (Denver) effort," she said. Sheldon is affiliated with the Traditional Values Coalition, a national group based in Anaheim, Calif. "The (anti-gay rights) videotape that is being used in the state of Oregon is also being used in the state of Colorado and was produced in the state of California."

But Colorado for Family Values has also garnered support from several popular figures within the state. University of Colorado head football coach Bill McCartney endorsed the proposed amendment, and serves on the campaign's board of directors.

McCartney, who led the Buffalo to a national football championship in 1990, stirred the biggest controversy when he described homosexuality as an "abomination of almighty God" at a news conference on university grounds at which he wore a University of Colorado sweater and stood beneath a university banner.

Reaction to McCartney's statement included a rally and calls for his dismissal. McCartney is currently in the second
