Gunshot victim released

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Wounded USC football player Jon McGee was released from a hospital Wednesday, two days after a stray gang bullet struck his arm.

McGee, who turns 19 on Thursday, left California Medical Center at about 10 a.m. and planned to recuperate at his parents' Arizona home, said hospital spokeswoman Lisa Fitch.

McGee, a freshman inside linebacker from Tucson, was struck in the left elbow by a bullet fired a quarter-mile away Monday by a bicycling gunman shooting at a car, police said. No one was arrested.

Meanwhile, it was disclosed that McGee's decision last winter to attend USC was unsettling for his parents.

"I don't remember what precipitated our anxiety about the area," his mother, Donna McGee, told the Los Angeles Times from Tucson. "I think the importance of the whole thing just kind of hit home at one point. It was like, 'What are we doing? Are we really sending him out there?'"

"And then you sit back and you say, 'These crazy things happen all over the world, and what are the chances of them happening to your child?' You just don't think that it could be possible."

She would not comment when asked if McGee would return to USC.

"I love USC, and I hate to give up some opportunity because of fear, but yet ... We're still weighing what happened and the likelihood of another incident like this happening," McGee said.

The university sits at the edge of gang-infested South Los Angeles, but it is actually a city within a city and maintains its own security force.

Across the street from USC, the burned remnants of the April 29 riots remind students of the violence that stopped just a few yards from their campus. The riots had little impact on the campus, where fall enrollment was up slightly to about 28,000 students.

"We can't change the location of the school," said Trojans coach Larry Smith. "It's one of those risks you've got to look at. It's a part of the scenario. It's part of the environment."
