QUESTION:

What do you think of the University's policy of not giving a full refund after the first day of classes?

"If they had not raised tuition, it might have been all right. But with the tuition increases, I think it's really unfair."

- HAZE MOSS
sophomore, undeclared

"As a returning student, I definitely would like the option of reviewing the class because I'm not familiar with the professors or the class content."

- LYNDA WESTCOTT
senior, journalism

"It doesn't seem fair because we're all college students and money isn't a big resource."

- RICHARD HINES-NORWOOD
junior, political science

"I'm disappointed because I feel that it's another negative step that will discourage students from coming here."

- SHARON ADAMS
senior, psychology

"I think we should be able to get all our money back after two or three visits to the class, when we actually understand what's going on in the class."

- SYREETA YOUNG
freshman, pre-business

"It's a money-making routine, and it's a quack. It's just another way of getting money into the school system."

- NORMAN MESMAN
freshman, pre-med

to live independently and free of paid support.

"Adults in society are expected to contribute as well as receive," Horner said.

Professor Diane Bricker works in the area of Early Intervention, a program that addresses "at risk" children, from infancy to age six.

These young children, Bricker says, are at risk in the sense that the early years of development are crucial in determining how well an individual will function later as members of the community.
