Powered Machines, founded the service to prove that his work-bikes can work.

"I'm known throughout the country for my work-bikes, but people are always skeptical about them," he said. "One of the clearest ways for people to see that it works is to prove it."

Using his own funds, VanderTuin made down payments for the company's insurance and other business costs. He said he also wanted to show that work-bikes are not abusive on the body. VanderTuin has made them a pleasure to ride by using mountain bike parts and is the first in the world to do so, he said.

One of Pedalers Express' customers said the service is saving him money and is good for the community. Jim Dotson, of Dot Dotson's Photo Finishing stores, replaced a full-time van route with Pedalers Express.

"We've done our delivery routes forever but looked at what it cost to run a pickup truck around and what we were adding to pollution and compared it to the bicycle service," he said.

"We save about 20 to 30 percent of our former delivery cost, and that doesn't even include vehicle costs," Dotson said. "And I feel better about it."

Dotson said he also tries to stimulate as much interest in the Pedalers Express as he can.

Long-Coogan would like to add some of Eugene's 450 attorneys into the service's client list.

Diane Bishop, city of Eugene Bicycle Coordinator, said she sees Pedalers Express as it relates to the entire state. She said the service is another small step toward the state's Goal 12, which calls for reducing Oregon's reliance on automobiles by 20 percent during the next 30 years.

Bishop said the state realizes that as more people move to Oregon, air quality and traffic will get worse. Portland is already in noncompliance with air quality regulations.
