WHITELAW

"Take Drain or Roseburg," he said. "They've got tourism, but they're highly dependent on the forest products industry. Take away the basic sectors, you reduce the overall economy, and it'll spiral downward."

Whitelaw also raised the ire of the tourism industry in his article by calling its role in Oregon's economy overrated; tourism employs only 2 percent to 4 percent of the state's work force, he said.

The Oregon Tourism Division defended itself last Wednesday in an editorial in The Register Guard, writing that tourists often return to Oregon to set up businesses.

Whitelaw also took on agriculture, once a large Oregon employer. Today, it employs only 4 percent to 6 percent of Oregon's workers, he said, and what he calls the Big Three — timber, tourism and agriculture — are no longer the economic drivers.

Whitelaw said he was surprised his article received so much attention.

"I thought it would be a yawner," he said.

But the issue at stake, he said, is more than just these industries' reputations.

"Lots of policies at the state and local level — like taxes and education — are influenced a lot or a little by how we perceive the ranking of those industries," he said.

For the the state to manage its resources wisely, it must recognize the Big Three are no longer so big, he said.

"As long as our perceptions fail to reflect reality, our economic policies will suffer," Whitelaw said.
