

STREETWISE

QUESTION:

What do you hate most about the Emerald?

"I guess the letters to the editor. They could use a little weeding out."

DIANA FLORES
freshman, journalism

"I hate the fact that there is no news in it. And Streetwise needs to ask more socially responsible questions."

DEBORAH WATKINS
second-year law student

"There's too many one-sided stories. Where do you get your information?"

ARANN HARRIS
freshman, undeclared

"The fact that there's not a crossword puzzle every day."

AMY LARSON
sophomore, poly sci

"I don't read it too much. It's too liberal."

BOBBY NOMA
junior, int. business

"Lack of comics. There wasn't even any today."

CHRIS TUCKER
sophomore, psychology

expressed." Christine Beneda said, "like speaking out against Measure 9 No other radio station did that."

This combination of music and political commentary created a station that for many was more than something to listen to in the car.

"To me," LindaLee Ellis said, "the KAVE is like the soul of Eugene because it's such an eclectic format."

Ellis, president of Friends of the KAVE, who organized Friday night's vigil, said several KAVE fans and DJs were hoping the KAVE could become a cooperatively run radio station and stay on the air.

After Ellis and her friends passed through the crowd collecting donations from people interested, Tannen announced that $500 had been collected.

Eric Alterman, one of the station owners, shook his head.

"It takes $50,000 to $70,000 to run a radio station each month," he said. "(The co-op) is a wonderful idea, but it's a long shot."

At times, the gathering seemed more like a party, especially when the DJs stopped playing commercials and decided to play back-to-back music until midnight.

The party atmosphere included the dancing crowd below as well as the booth, where people ate, drank and danced in the narrow aisle between the wall-to-wall shelves of alphabetized CDs and the console from which the DJs worked.

The KAVE's last song passed quietly, the crowd by the fountain swaying in unison underneath the windows of the booth, cheering and whistling at the end.
