financial support from the OCA, he said, and is certain that the organization will not fund any portion of his campaign. Having unsuccessfully run for a school board position in 1990, Hoyt said he believes the current school board is against him. The school board did not appoint Hoyt to a seat on a budget committee which he applied for. Hoyt said he believes he was the most qualified candidate.

"It became apparent that the current school board doesn't want anything to do with me," Hoyt said. "There's a lot of intolerance in the school system."

Eugene realtor and community leader Jean Tate, who has been involved in the efforts to defeat Hoyt, claimed that one of the main reasons people are opposed to the candidate is not because of his ties to the OCA.

Tate said Hoyt ran what she calls a "character assassination" campaign in the 1990 school board election.

Hoyt said he is not asking that children in Eugene schools should be taught that homosexuality is wrong. His opinion is that it should be left up to the parents to discuss sexual preferences and left out of the schools.

"The transmission of values is something that should be left to the parents," Hoyt said.

Since withdrawing from the race, Stent and Harris have been supporting efforts to elect Pryor, the candidate who has been endorsed by the Eugene Education Association. Pryor said he shares similar views with the withdrawn candidates. He said he is hoping the race will not get sidetracked on issues unrelated to the school board such as homosexuality and religion.

"We're running a campaign to address the issues and get them resolved," said Pryor. "The best person for the job is the person who should get the job."

Pryor said he believes his financial background and his active community involvement have earned him the respect needed to win a school board seat. He understands the budget problems that are currently facing the district and wants to keep the board from steering away from the critical issues, he said.

"You need someone who knows how the budgeting works both inside and out," Pryor said.

Another candidate, Kathleen Sellers Sniezko, a homemaker and former school teacher, said she was approached by community leaders who said the race will probably be nasty and implied she should withdraw from the race and support Chris Pryor. Sniezko, who will run a grassroots campaign, said she has no intentions of dropping out of the race, regardless of her opinions about the OCA.

"I felt they were trying to circumvent democracy by determining who should run in a given race," said Sniezko. "I believe it's up to the voters to decide who they want to have on the school board."

Sniezko is opposed to a member of the OCA being elected to the school board because she believes there is no room on the board for any special interest group. She is not entirely scared of Hoyt winning the election because as one of seven board members, Hoyt would not have a great enough pull to push OCA programs on the school district, she said.

"I'm going to keep the focus where the focus belongs - on the children," said Sniezko. "I'm in this race as an advocate for children."

William Cassara, also running for the position, said he was not asked to drop out of the election and will stay in the race. He said he found it offensive that other candidates had been asked to drop out of the race.

"To me, the parents and people who vote ought to have the choice of seven candidates based on what ideas they have presented," Cassara said.
