BLANCHARD

As Brand's main press liaison, Blanchard and Brand developed a close association that both said they will miss. Blanchard admitted he had a lump in his throat when saying good-bye to the president Wednesday.

Brand cares about the University and has an excellent sense of how to attract support for higher education from individuals and organizations that aren't naturally drawn to higher education in Oregon, Blanchard said.

"Myles consults with people and he listens," Blanchard said. "He'll always be the standard with which I judge other presidents I work with in my line of work."

The president said Blanchard's "excellent social and academic values" will be missed as well as his contributions to the University in such a short time.

One of Blanchard's responsibilities included gathering information on student activities. He worked closely with the ASUO. Vice President Karmen Fore said he was a pleasure to work with.

"I thought L.G. was really student-oriented," Fore said. "I hope whoever replaces him has the same dedication as he had."

Blanchard will be covering news at Washington's College of Engineering, which has a $30 million budget this year. He will also be working with a 13-person staff as opposed to a four-person staff in Oregon's bureau.

Although Blanchard wanted a change, he said if Measure 5 didn't exist, he wouldn't have considered quitting.

Last summer, along with 217 other officers of administration — defined as non-teaching faculty — Blanchard received a "timely notice" that said his contract may not be renewed in June because of state budget cuts. Blanchard wasn't chosen as one of the eight administrators to lose their jobs in the most recent round of cuts.

Although excited about the challenge of a new campus and different responsibilities, Blanchard said it's impossible to know what the future may hold.

"Who knows? I'm returning to the University of Washington now, and maybe some day I'll return to this campus," he said.

MEETING

Wooten met with constituents in the City Council chamber for a town meeting Thursday night to determine what kinds of budget cuts or tax reform options citizens find acceptable.

"We often don't see the faces in Salem," Hosticka said, "just the numbers."

Those numbers were replaced by faces Thursday night as citizens were invited to share their concerns about proposed legislation. Several people urged Hosticka and Wooten not to support drastic reductions in the state services budget that would diminish the quality of education or create hardships for people who rely on state medical services.

The two representatives also conducted an informal poll to see which revenue replacement options citizens favor most. Gov. Barbara Roberts' proposed beer and wine tax received the most support, while the proposed $300 million cut in basic education support received the least.

attempted sexual abuse and harassment that occurred at about 10:30 p.m. Feb. 23 on the 1300 block of Charnelton Street. The victim was knocked to the ground and the suspect attempted to reach up her skirt. The victim screamed and the suspect ran away. The suspect is described as a white male, 5-foot-10, medium weight and build with dark hair.

• A University student reported a incident of sexual harassment that occurred at about 1:30 a.m. Feb. 24 on the 2400 block of Patterson Street. The student was riding her bicycle when four male juveniles made inappropriate sexual remarks. Drayton said an informational report was taken on the incident.

• A woman reported an attempted kidnapping at the Valley River Center parking lot at 4 p.m. Feb. 24. The suspect asked the woman for a ride and when she refused, he attacked her. The suspect was described as a white male, 5-foot-10, thin build with short, dark hair.

Drayton said although some of these incidents took place outside the campus area, OPS wants to alert the campus community so people can take precautions to protect their health and safety.

OPS and EPD hope releasing the information will raise awareness on campus.
