Leader's mother says he called

CHANDLER, Texas (AP) — The mother of the cult leader at the center of a deadly confrontation with authorities says she believes he's in touch with God and that she had a premonition something would bring him wide attention.

"I didn't know when or what, but I knew something would happen that would make the message go out to the world," Bonnie Haldeman said Monday.

Sunday the religious sect headed by her 33-year-old son, David Koresh, had engaged in two deadly gun battles with federal agents trying to arrest Koresh. Four agents and two cult members were killed.

As Mrs. Haldeman spoke, she and Koresh's stepfather, Roy, were preparing to drive from this small east Texas town to Waco, where police and federal agents had the sect's isolated compound surrounded.

Koresh, who said he was wounded in the gun battle, was still inside, along with several followers. The group had released several children.

Mrs. Haldeman spoke reverently of how her son memorized the New Testament when he was 12.

"He would come home and go out to the barn and pray for hours," she said.

A former Seventh-day Adventist, Mrs. Haldeman joined her son's Branch Davidian sect several years ago when she lived in Waco.

Although she later left the group, she said she still believes in her son.

"I really think he is inspired of God," she said.

"I may not have always agreed with everything, but I've never heard anyone teach like he does. I want to believe that God's working through him."

Mrs. Haldeman, who works as a nurse, said her son telephoned after Sunday's shootouts and left a message on her answering machine.

"Hello, mama. It's your boy," Koresh said.

"They shot me and I'm dying, all right? But I'll be back real soon, OK?"

'He's not the monster experts say he is. He loves children.'

Davidian sect cult leader's mother

She said the children at his cult compound include three of her grandchildren: Cyrus, 7; Star, 5; and Bobbie Layne, 14 months. Koresh claimed in telephone interviews that his youngest child died in Sunday's gun battle and many of the children at the compound were his.

Mrs. Haldeman said she was confident reports that her son was a child abuser were false, and she said she didn't believe he precipitated Sunday's shootings.

"He is not a vicious person," she said. "He's not the monster experts say he is. He loves children."

New York, other cities fear wave of terrorism

NEW YORK (AP) — Even the hardiest New Yorkers, not to mention jittery tourists, admitted to a frightening new vulnerability after the World Trade Center explosion.

Murders and muggings may be common in New York. Bombings are not.

"This is something totally new," said Carla Deleon, 25, who works at the World Trade Center. "It's something I never thought would happen here. Now we're thinking, how soon until it happens again?"

Private and public patrols were beefed up around the city. Visitors' bags were checked at the Empire State Building. Uniformed security guards began inspecting trucks entering buildings at Rockefeller Center.

Deleon's friend Ruth Palacio, a 27-year-old cable TV producer, was even more worried about the city's latest — and most ominous — urban woe. Even though investigators don't know if Friday's bomb was an act of terrorism, many fear it was.

"All of a sudden it's terrorism in our back yard," said Palacio. "You get used to hearing about it in Europe but not here. You can't help but wonder if it'll entice other nuts into trying the same thing."

Bill Garrity, 27, an actor from Philadelphia, said: "This is all I need. My grandmother hears about this and she panics. She's always telling me, 'All the crazies are there, why don't you come home?' She really panicked after this."

But not only New Yorkers were stunned by the explosion. Since Friday, cities around the country have increased safety at business hubs and airports.

Security has been stepped up at Chicago's 110-story Sears Tower, the world's tallest building, where more than 5,000 people work daily, said Perry Chlan, a spokesman for Sears, Roebuck and Co. He declined to provide specifics.

Security was also tightened at the Chicago Board of Trade and the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, the world's largest commodities futures exchanges.

Court lets libel suit stand

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court let stand a $375,000 libel award against a Charleston, W. Va., newspaper Monday but refused to reinstate a $1 million libel award against a Battle Creek, Mich., newspaper.

In the West Virginia case, the court turned away arguments that the libel award violated the Charleston Gazette's free-press rights. Lawyers for the newspaper said the editorial which provoked the suit was never proved to be substantially false.

In the Michigan case, only two justices voted to review a ruling that threw out a libel judgment because the contested article in the Enquirer and News of Battle Creek about a man's arrest "was not materially false."
