

Students who went away to college didn't think they would end up building

MUD HUTS

A curious village of mud, straw and glass huts now stands between the ceramics and painting buildings just north of the Millrace.

University students in a ceramic sculpture class constructed the huts as part of a term-long project involving exploration of primitive structures as a means of artistic expression.

Although rain and problems with materials had damaged some of the huts, they were repaired and completed over the weekend in preparation for the class' final review Monday.

"I felt that we could learn as much from mistakes as we could from doing it all right," said the course instructor, Sana Krusoe. "Decisions were very communally made."

This term marks the first time such a course has been offered at the University. Krusoe hopes to have a similar class next year.
