student groups.

"We don't want to become insulated," Johnson said. Warren and Johnson said they want to encourage more graduate, non-traditional, international and returning student participation. They plan to create two ASUO positions: a non-traditional/returning student advocate and an international student advocate.

To improve lighting on campus and increase students' safety. Warren and Johnson will launch an "Adopt a Light Post" campaign. Local businesses, greek houses and community groups can contribute money for new posts and have their names imprinted on them. Warren, a psychology major, is the codirector of Black Women Of Achievement, co-founder and coordinator of Students of Color Building Bridges and chairwoman of the Affirmative Action Advisory Board's subcommittee for student concerns.

Johnson, an economics and anthropology double major, is the coordinator of the Dorothy Project, a program designed to assist children in Uga. da with their medical and educational needs. He is also a founding member of the Tanzanian Association of Anthropologists and Archaeologists.

Warren and Johnson now join Eric Bowen, ASUO programs coordinator, and Diana Collins Puente, ASUO multicultural advocate, who announced they were running for ASUO president and vice president, respectively, last month.
