Pistons, Bulls fined for fight

NEW YORK (AP) — Darrell Walker of the Chicago Bulls was suspended for one game and fined $10,000 on Wednesday, and Bill Laimbeer of the Detroit Pistons — the third disciplinary action against him this season — was fined $12,000 because of a bench-clearing scuffle.

The Bulls' Scott Williams was fined $6,000 for taking part in the incident Monday night, when the Bulls beat Detroit 98-95.

The fines and Walker's suspension were announced by Rod Thorn, the NBA's vice president for operations.

Walker was suspended for leaving the bench while not in uniform and attempting to fight Laimbeer after Williams and Laimbeer tangled with 5:05 left in the second quarter.

"I didn't like Laimbeer as a teammate when I was over there," Walker, a Piston last season, said Wednesday. "But I don't believe in violence even against people I don't like. I didn't throw a punch. I don't think I would have. But maybe Mark saved me a little more money."

Walker was referring to former teammate Mark Aguirre, who held him back.

Walker is on the injured list with a strained lower back, and his suspension will be served after his return to the lineup.

Laimbeer was fined for precipitating the incident by slapping Williams in the face. Williams, who hit Laimbeer in the head with an open palm, was fined for retaliating.

"I wasn't going to take that from him. You have to stand up for yourself," Williams said. "I thought the fines are steep. Obviously, I'm pleased that Laimbeer's fine was more."

Both players received ejections, which carry an additional fine of $250 each.

"I'm not surprised," Laimbeer said. "I knew what would happen as soon as the incident took place. In the NBA's manual on violence, Page One and Article One is 'When in doubt, fine Laimbeer heavily.'"

"I just look at the fines as the price of doing business. It's like paying graft."
