would be interested in purchasing the radio station and now think they have found an interested buyer. Although Parker would not reveal any names, the group is optimistic about the prospect and believes some sort of deal will be made in the next few weeks.

"(The potential investor) thinks the KAVE can work from the business end if we can make it work from the programming end," Parker said.

If the deal is carried through, listeners can expect the KAVE to return to its original home within the next five months. The new KAVE will play the same unique music that made it so popular to its listeners.

"The main thrust of the station will be the same," Parker said. "Our philosophy was always just play the cool music wherever we find it."

Friends of the KAVE are aware of the financial problems that previously plagued the station, but believe someone with a strong business background can keep the KAVE on the air. Parker said the group is considering accepting pledges to listeners to help with operating costs if they are legally able to do so.

Parker said former KAVE staff members are committed to returning to the station, mostly because of the strong base of listener support.

"The amount of support we've gotten from the listeners has just been great," he said. "We always thought we dug a foothold in the community."

of Appeals said it wouldn't consider most of the errors the Metzgers claimed were made because they didn't raise the points during the trial.

The jury found that Metzger and his son incited the killers by sending an agent to Portland to stir up skinhead violence against non-whites.

Metzger's home and his television repair business were seized after the trial to help pay the damage award.

"Our literature is heavy-duty stuff, but we don't call for anyone to go out and kill anybody," Metzger said.

"My message is white separatism."

Rosenthal said the free speech point isn't a valid one.
