Teacher suspended over extra credit

LONGVIEW, Wash. (AP) — A high school teacher who gave his students extra credit for buying condoms has been suspended, but also praised.

"I honor this teacher," hearing examiner Frederick Rasmussen said Tuesday in upholding the Longview School District's two-week unpaid suspension of Larry Wagle. But he added, "You're guilty of insubordination and it was your choice."

Wagle proposed the extra credit after his ninthgrade world history class discussed a newspaper article about condom shoplifting by teens too shy to buy them.

After getting permission from parents, interested students had to buy a condom from a store clerk of the opposite sex, take a witness and get a receipt. Three students took part. Several angry parents called to complain.

Wagle argued that many American teens are in danger of getting AIDS because they're too embarrassed to buy condoms.

"We are something like accessories to manslaughter when we do not educate about condom use," he said during the hearing. "Condoms are essential in the modern world."

District lawyer John Binns said the suspension was "an extraordinarily mild" response for insubordination. Wagle also violated state guidelines on AIDS instruction. Condoms are not distributed in the district's schools.

Wagle, frequently at odds with school administrators, represented himself at the hearing, padding across the room in his socks and stroking his flowing white beard. He said the issues were academic freedom and AIDS prevention.

"If parents had a chance to say no to the assignment, what's the beef?" he said.

Clark Geer, AIDS coordinator for the Cowlitz County Health District, was called as a witness by Wagle and said the county has one of the state's highest rates of sexually transmitted diseases.

"I think it is commendable for a teacher to put himself on the line for condoms. I think it's amazing and may save lives," he said.
