Starting fall, tickets to cost money

By Garin Gonzales
For the Oregon Daily Emerald

Effective this fall, student tickets to football and men's basketball will now cost $2, because of cutbacks by the Incidental Fee Committee.

Joan Garr Hamrick, director of athletic promotions, said it was inevitable that students would have to pay for the once-free football and men's basketball tickets.

"With incidental fees being cut, something was going to have to give," Garr Hamrick said. "However, all other sporting event tickets will still be free to students."

Garr Hamrick said that this may affect attendance at sporting events in the short-run, but with the promotions and marketing "push" of the tickets, she is sure that the response and sales will be equal, if not better, than previous years.

"We've never actually went out and canvassed the University to sell tickets before," Garr Hamrick said. "We're going to set up booths at the UO Street

Faire and the EMU, set up displays at the bookstore, as well as visit fraternity and sorority houses."

There will also be incentives for buying tickets, such as the Family and Friends Program, which will enable friends and family of students to sit in the student section of home football games.

For the cost of a general admission ticket, up to four special tickets may be purchased by a University student. However, these tickets are on an availability basis only.

Another incentive to buying student tickets is that you can now purchase tickets at one time for an entire group. A University student may purchase tickets for several students if a current University identification card and $2 is provided for each ticket purchased.

Season student tickets for football and men's basketball are also available. Tickets will be available at the McArthur Court Ticket Office, the Casanova Athletic Center, and on game day at the gate of Autzen Stadium.
