Coach confident with new team

Coach Gerry Gregory believes the young Duck volleyball team will be competitive in the Pacific-10 Conference.

Despite the youth and relative inexperience of the Oregon women's volleyball team, coach Gerry Gregory is confident that his team can be competitive with any school in the Pacific-10 Conference.

"I'm optimistic that this team — that if they're playing a great match — they can beat anybody in this league," said Gregory, who is in his eighth year of coaching at Oregon. "I don't think there is anybody that would say, 'We're not even going to try.'"

The volleyball team has finished ninth the past two years in the Pac-10. However, Gregory said the Ducks are "still an unproven team, so I would guess that we still will have some disappointing matches. But I think this team is going to end up being

Two disappointing seasons near the bottom of the league. Only two returning starters for the 1993 season.

But two new assistant coaches and two words — intensity and aggressiveness — are making a difference this year for the women's volleyball team, said returning players Kalie Kerr and LaReina Woods.

"I think everyone here is sick of losing, so we're developing an attitude now of 'Refuse to lose,'" Kerr said.

"We are more aggressive than we have ever been," Woods said.

The transition this year has not been easy. With six rookies and one redshirt stepping in, all led by lone senior Nicolle Hedberg, who is co-captain with Woods), concentration and focus have also been key.

"We have new coaches and a lot of new players, so things are a lot different than last year," Kerr said. "We've really picked it up in intensity level."

Kerr, a junior beginning her second year as setter, has had even more to learn than usual. The Ducks are switching to a swing offense, an audible offense system that takes concentration and quick verbal processing skills.

However, Kerr said "it's actually easier on me as a setter because the hitters do a lot of the calling."

Kerr has found that the dual role of setter and returning starter has put her in a leadership position.

"I really try to run the offense and set the tone for practice," Kerr said. "I touch the ball a lot, so naturally people are going to focus on what I'm
