This fan found the Grateful Dead to be oh-so sweet.

DEADHEADS

Ingenuity is a strong trait of these folk. In the Track Town Pizza parking lot, I met about 10 youths who had rented a U-Haul, driven it all the way from Mesa, Ariz., and slept in it ... with their dog, of course. The kids had the 19-year-old Owen to thank for their safe arrival, for he piloted the vessel most of the way, sometimes at speeds up to 90 mph. When Owen is not touring with the band, he says he likes to "drink beer" and "smoke pot."

Not everyone I talked to seemed as brain dead as Owen and the U-Haul gang. Edward, a 26-year-old Portlander, was a thriving entrepreneur. He hasn't been to many shows of late because of his thriving new business selling wild mushrooms he collects in the forest. The smiling, short-haired man told me that mushrooms (no, not those kind) fetch $40 a pound, and are so valuable that a collector might get shot at.

Sean, a thirtysomething teacher from Vancouver, B.C., gave me some green zinc oxide to put on my nose and cheeks with the warning, "you'll look like a wierdo." I had no worries about that here — I've been to enough shows to know that in the realm of personal appearance, anything goes. I thought, recalling the man I had seen with blackberry juice smeared all over his loinclothed body.

I asked if his high school stu-
